A Southern Kansas paper tells how the farmers near Sedan fixed a bad stretch of road at a cost of $50 a mile. "Beginning several months ago on a poor stretch of road that is much traveled, the farmers living within a close benefit district clubbed together—less than a dozen of them—and dragged the road until it had a suitable grade and a slightly rounding top. They then hauled a crude oil production and sprinkled with an ordinary oil sprinkler no heavier than a street sprinkler. Vehicles passing over this oiled surface mixed the oil with the dust and dirt. It became a hard surface like asphalt and grew harder and smoother with each week's travel until now it has a surface equal to some oiled rock roads."
